I - Introduction

If a lawyer is engaged to defend a mentally disabled (intellectually disabled) client, the client may be in need of an assessment to determine whether he or she is mentally disabled and the extent, nature and effect of the disability. In some cases, the client may have been assessed by one or more various agencies or she may be in the process of being assessed in a forensic facility. For diagnosis or assessment of a client or for information about a particular mental disability, the first agencies to contact are governmental—Alberta Human Services or Alberta Health Services: Mental Health & Wellness. If a client is thought to be in urgent need of medical attention, a hospital should be contacted directly.

Of primary importance at this time, as always, is the issue of confidentiality. Not only will the lawyer have to receive the client's consent before his/ her case may be discussed with an agency, but the agency itself may need permission from the client to discuss her/ his case with the lawyer.¹

In making recommendations for clients who have become involved in the criminal justice system, there are a number of considerations. These are outlined as follows:

Income

Clients may be eligible for the Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped (AISH) program, which provides financial assistance to eligible adults with a disability. Alberta Family and Social Services is the government branch to contact for this. Drop-In Centers and the Salvation Army can provide emergency services for those lacking money—shelter, food, and clothing—but are not adequate long-term solutions.

Housing

If the client is capable of independent living, most local authorities have some low-cost rental accommodation available. In most cases, however, Alberta Housing and Consumer Affairs will only provide housing through organizations working directly with the disadvantaged, and referrals are necessary.

Sometimes support is essential for the client to maintain an independent life-style. Home services can be arranged through Alberta Family and Social Services, and through some non-government agencies, such as the Canadian Mental Health Association. In the event that the client is unable to live independently, a number of agencies provide group homes, for either short-term or permanent residence.

Education/Life Skills/Employment

Life style choice is another area where it may be necessary to assist the client. Most people need to feel some sense of purpose in life, and satisfaction in performing work to the level of their abilities. Many organizations offer educational/ ability assessments, life skills training, and pre-employment or vocational training. Some will provide sheltered workshops for those who cannot work comfortably in competitive employment; and others will assist clients in finding work--paid or voluntary--and will provide on-the-job coaching until the client is accustomed to an unfamiliar work site.

Social Support/Counseling

Last, though not least, it is important that clients are offered support, counseling and social activities. Otherwise, feelings of isolation and low self-esteem may become overwhelming. Apart from the basic needs and dignity of the client, loneliness can lead to declining health, both physical and mental, and poor decision-making, possibly leading to infringements of the law.

Agencies change over time and may be found in different localities. National or provincial organizations, such as the Canadian Mental Health Association, The Salvation Army, and the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry Societies, while keeping a wide mandate, may only offer some services in some areas. They are useful to contact, because they may have access to recent information about other organizations in the locality. In addition, when these organizations are made aware of clients with special needs, it helps them to remain responsive to these needs.

Smaller, local organizations are sometimes very flexible with regards to the help they can offer clients. Information about smaller organizations, however, can date easily. Also, they may have some limits on the numbers of clients they can handle at any given time, and how many they will accept who are being sent versus attending voluntarily. It is advisable to check before assuming that an organization is still in operation, has room for the client and is willing to help.

This chapter is divided into regions. As can be seen below, an organization may be marked with "education & employment", "legal", "rehabilitation", "residential", and or "support". "Education & employment" indicates that the agency offers educational programs, vocational training, employment support or volunteer opportunities for people with disabilities. “Legal” indicates that the agency offers legal assistance, education, etc. “Rehabilitation” only refers to rehabilitation for brain injuries or disabilities; it is unrelated to addiction services. “Residential” indicates that the agency has a residence or offers support for independent living. “Support” refers to counselling or similar services. These markers may not cover every service offered by an agency but are provided as a guide to the commonly requested services.

This Chapter is divided, first into regions, then into agencies working with intellectually disabled individuals (including brain injured and those who have Alzheimer's disease) or mental illnesses, and then into the types of services offered. Many agencies have multiple services, and are cross-referenced.
